It's not just the lack of a clear, consistent message that's the problem. It's also the lack of a clear, consistent strategy. The U.S. has a long history of sending mixed signals to the world. For example, in the 1990s, the U.S. was the first to demand that Russia reform its economy, but then it refused to provide the aid and technical assistance that Russia needed to do so. This kind of behavior has made it difficult for the world to trust the U.S. and to see it as a leader in the fight against terrorism.
